

Authors

Nico Ravanilla

University of California, San Diego

Attracting Good People into Public Service:
Evidence from a Field Experiment in the Philippines*

Nico Ravanilla†

October 27, 2016

Abstract

This paper evaluates a policy intervention designed to attract good political candidates – competent and honest ones – to public service. Inspired by the idea that schooling can act as a screening mechanism, and that non-monetary status awards can be a cost-effective tool to incentivize individuals, we evaluate whether a leadership training workshop with performance-based awards can screen and incentivize good people to serve in public office. In the context of a randomized field experiment among aspirants for the village youth councils in the Philippines, we find that this policy intervention is effective in terms of attracting individuals with above-median measures of public service motivation, intellectual ability, integrity, and aspiration.

Keywords: political selection, public service motivation, incentives, screening, leadership training workshop, political elite behavior

JEL Code: H11

---

*I am grateful for financial support from Abdul Latif Jameel Poverty Action Lab (J-PAL) - Governance Initiative, The Angus Center for Law and Economics, Rashdan Graduate School, First School International Policy Center, and MCI/ed Initiative - University of Michigan. I thank my advisors Anna Gyomai-Besse, Alan Hicken, Arthur Lupia, and Dean Yang for their guidance. I am grateful for the feedback from Don Emerson, Eddy Malabiy, Tom Pappas, Sarah-Sabir-Rosenfeld, Paul Schuler, Don Slater, Meredith Wirtz, and all the participants of the Southeast Asia Research Group Meeting 2015. I also benefited from comments by Chano Achik, Bill Clark, Michael Eardman, Mark Emerson, Mai Hassan, Nahomi Ichino, Kenneth McEwan, Noah Nathan, Jim Marrow, Iain Ogilvie, Eric Sheffer, and seminar participants at the University of Michigan, the American Political Science Association Annual Meeting in 2015, and Southern Political Science Association Annual Meeting in 2016. I thank the staff of Innovations for Poverty Action - Philippines (IPA) for their unparalleled field management. This study received ethical approval from the UM-IRB (IR3M0074256). Pre-analysis plans for this study are documented at osf.io/qgqzq and AEA RCT registry.

†Assistant Professor - University of California San Diego - School of Global Policy & Strategy. Email: nravanilla@ucsd.edu.

Attracting Good People into Public Service: Evidence from a Field Experiment in the Philippines

This paper evaluates a policy intervention designed to attract good political candidates – competent and honest ones – to public service. Inspired by the idea that schooling can act as a screening mechanism, and that non-monetary status awards can be a cost-effective tool to incentivize individuals, we evaluate whether a leadership training workshop with performance-based awards can screen and incentivize good people to serve in public office. In the context of a randomized field experiment among aspirants for the village youth councils in the Philippines, we find that this policy intervention is effective in terms of attracting individuals with above-median measures of public service motivation, intellectual ability, integrity, and aspiration.

October 26, 2016